Wallack's Theater.

A brilliant andience welcomed, last evening, the reopening of Mr. Wallack's season. The general aspect of the assemblage was as familiar as the appearance of the house itself, and it needed but a clance to show that few absolute strangers were there to join in the annual greeting. The past history of Wallack's Theater has secured for it a confidence among those whose confidence is best worth possessing, and these are seldom absent when the occasion calls for demonstration of their esteem and good-will. Mr. Wallack's audience is quite his own; and it changes less from year to year-we might almost say from night to night-than that of any at the outset of a new term of management. They come to offer "the compliments of the new season, leaving the question of regular amusement-seeking to future evenings. As regards the future, however, there is every faith in Mr. Wallack's old gift of providing a capital entertainment at all times entertainment of sounder and more trustworthy character than can be positively guaranteed else where, and which, in an artistic view, is tolerably sure to lead, rather than to fall behind popular

We have great respect for actors who can preserve their intellectual liberties amid some of the anaconda-coils of Mr. Knowles's sentences. But his plays are all effective, spite of this, and they have the quality of provoking the interest of an addience to just the critical limit, and then judiciously meeting it half-way. We are bound to speak with particular attention of the orchestral pieces, partly because of their being newly written for the occasion, and partly because the orchestra itself is finer, fuller, and better administered than any, not only in this city, but, we say The reisti with confidence, than any in London or Paris, the capitals of European taste.
